which retards the French in the art of killing their fellow-beings in a scientific manner. The reform of the Prench army system has been confided to a committee of old degies, the very representatives of the red-tape system, who look upon every innovation with a feeling akin to horror. As a specimen of their action we will mention the fact that the principle of universal military service, the great cause of Prussa's military strength, finds but few friends in the sub-committee on recruiting, and that a majority of the committee are in favor of the conscription system of 1839, which prescribes a long term of service for a certain number of recruits who are drafted by lot, but have 'the right to procure substitutes. The old officers of the last war, in which the armed people of Germany—for the term of service in Prussa is so short that we cannot name that small part of the German forces which was a standing army—swept the war-worn professional soldiers of France before it, and hardly left a handful of them in the field after less than a month's fighting. But they have grown up in the contempt of "armed rabble," as they are wont to name popular armies, and all the hard blows which they sustained in the last twelve month have not been able to destroy their prejudices. They prepose to go aven ferther, and to utterly disband the French National Guards in order to confide the defense of the country altogether to a standing army of professional soldiers. And while they thus propose to continue the old rotten conscription system in France, the provisions for an improvement of the military schools of France are likewise insufficient. They "pooh, poon" the idea that the German officers are superior to the French—a fact clearly demonstrated to every one else but themselves during the last war—and pointing to the example of the Generals of Narolzon I., who conquered all Europe, they assert that school learning does not make the best officers. It is so easy for these gentlemen to ascribe their stunning defeats of last year to the treachery of the Imperial leaders, instead of to their own incapacity, that it is natural they should apply this agreeable balm to their wounded vanity. It is the same old practice that brought ruin and disaster upon France, when the French people, wrapt in fancied security, latened with eminent satisfaction to the words of the French Minister of War, Marshal Languar, who told them: "I am ready, quite ready; let us declare war. The situation never was more favorable." It never was, indeed—for the Germans; but a few weeks sufficed to tear the French from their hanny dram and the same Referring to the school law in Texas, the areas on News says: "We do not believe, if we arched the world over, another instance can found of such an outrageous attempt to rindle the people out of their money, under the reclose protense of promoting the cause of

Some lines of trade, as dry goods, drugs and country produce, show very considerable activity; others, as groceries, floir and grain, from and iron products, only moderate sales; and others, as provisions, but very light movements. The trade in bagging is not so large as was expected, and, if this shows anything, it is evidence of a short cotton evop.
Psices have not materially changed during the week in any line, and the general run of trade is still confined to actual wants. Dry goods, howvex, sounds the first note of the fall trade; quite a number of buyers are in the market from the South, especially from Arkansas and Mississippi, and they are buying pretty largely. By the first
